This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1847 edition. Excerpt: ...the marshy campos, as well as those which haunt the gentle stream. Among those which inhabit the former, the Scarlet Ibis (Tantalus Ruber) and Roseate Spoonbill (Platalea Ajaja) may be specified as the most brilliant and interesting. The Scarlet Ibis (Tantalus Ruber) when full grown measures about twenty-three inches in length and thirty-seven in extent. Its beak is five inches long, and is quadrangular at its base. It is sharp-ridged and curved downward. During the first six months of its existence this bird changes its plumage from black to gray, and indeed becomes perfectly white before the conclusion of the year. It then begins gradually to assume a red appearance, which at the close of the third year settles into a rich and glowing scarlet. It is then truly a magnificent bird. The Roseate Spoonbill (Platalea Ajaja) is one of the most extraordinary species of the feathered tribe. The adult of either sex is two feet six inches in length, and about four feet in extent. The bill of the bird, from which the generic name of the race is derived, is generally about four or five inches in length, and of a form somewhat resembling that of a spoon. The Spoonbill is often seen in company with the Ibis, and like that bird does not attain its perfect plumage until the third year. However, it is a much rarer bird. Its adult plumage is of a roseate cast, while the feathers on the shoulders are of the most exquisite vermilion. There is but one other species included in this singular genus, which on account of its diminutive size has been called the Dwarf Spoonbill. The Ibis are sometimes seen in flocks of several hundreds, which at a distance appear like clouds of crimson, floating in the air, while
